

Pooled Income Funds

What if you would like to make a gift to the Church of the Brethren that provides income, but prefer an income that can fluctuate over time with interest and dividend rates. In that case, you might want to consider the Church of the Brethren's pooled income fund. As in the case of a charitable gift annuity, participation in a pooled income fund can usually begin with a relatively modest amount.

Under the terms of the pooled income fund, a number of donors make contributions to a common trust fund over time. The assets in the fund are generally invested for a balanced return of income and growth over time. Each year a pro rata share of the earnings of the trust is returned to each participant. Contact us for more information about how our fund is invested and recent returns.

As in the case of a charitable gift annuity, an immediate income tax charitable deduction is allowed for a portion of the value of the amount contributed to the pooled income fund. Capital gain tax that would be due on a sale of assets that have increased in value and are contributed to the pooled income fund may be entirely avoided. Assets used to fund your pooled income fund contribution can also be removed from your estate for federal tax purposes.
